Can the money supply destroy a society?

Vladimir Lenin thought so. The first communist leader of the Soviet Union once remarked that the best way to destroy a society is to destroy its money. If a society's money became valueless, it would no longer be accepted in exchange for goods and services in product markets. As a consequence, people would resort to barter, and the economy's efficiency would be severely impaired. Adolf Hitler tried unsuccessfully to use this weapon against Great Britain during World War II. His plan was to counterfeit British currency, then drop it from planes flying over England. He believed that the sudden increase in the quantity of money, together with its suspect origins, would make the British pound valueless.

Paraphrase

Vladimir Lenin said that to cause a chaos in society one should ruin the flow of money and hence people would resort to barter to exchange the products and service, thus impairing the economy.
